

Development of new superconductors from the viewpoint of crystal chemistry

Hiraku Ogino (AIST)

Unconventional superconductors such as cuprate and iron-based superconductors are composed of superconducting layers and blocking layers. These compounds are interesting not only their physical properties but also their crystal structures as inorganic materials.

In this presentation recent reports of materials development and factors to design these compounds will be discussed.